14. Americans in general have previously held a rather parochial view of the world. Explain parochialism and why it is important to understand different cultures and environments.

Answer: Parochialism means that we see things solely through our own eyes and from our uniquely American perspective. Parochialism translates into "We believe what we do is best." Americans often do not recognize that other people have valid, though different, ways of thinking and doing things. Parochialism causes Americans to view their practices as being better than practices in other cultures. Of course, that cannot be the case. However, changing this perception first requires us to understand different cultures and their environments.

All countries have different cultural environments— values, morals, customs, and laws. Supervisors need to comprehend some basics of cultural differences and environments. For example, in the United States, certain laws guard against discriminatory hiring and employment practices. Similar laws do not exist in all other countries. Understanding cultural environments, then, is critical to the success of supervising others in the global village.

LO: 2.2 Describe how technology is changing the supervisor's job

AACSB: Analytical thinking

21. How does technology change the supervisor's job?

Answer: Whether it is automated robotics on the production floor, computer-aided design in the engineering department, or automated accounting systems, new technologies are changing the supervisor's job. With that information, supervisors can better formulate plans, make faster decisions, more clearly define the jobs that workers need to perform, and monitor work activities on an as-they-happen basis. In essence, technology today has enhanced supervisors' ability to perform their jobs. Technology is also changing where a supervisor's work is performed. Work, for many, takes place where their computers are. Telecommuting capabilities—linkage of a remote worker's computer to those of coworkers and management at an office—have made it possible for employees to be located anywhere in the global village. Communicating effectively with individuals in remote locations and ensuring that their performance objectives are being met are some of the supervisor's new challenges.

26. How are e-businesses rewriting the rules of business communications?

Answer: Because they're designed around comprehensive, integrated information networks, traditional communication channels of going through the "chain of command" no longer constrain communication. E-businesses allow and even encourage individuals to communicate directly without going through channels. Employees can communicate instantly any- time, with anyone, anywhere, and their supervisors may not know what is being said. As such, how communication flows has changed dramatically, making obsolete or revising interpersonal communication concepts such as the distinction between formal and informal networks, nonverbal communication, and filtering. They also are redefining how activities such as meetings, negotiations, supervision, and "water cooler" talks are conducted.

33. What is workforce diversity? What is the impact of the growth of diversity in the workforce on supervisors?

Answer: The single most important human resource issue in organizations today may be adapting organizational policies and practices in light of increasing workforce diversity. This diverse workforce is made up of males, females, whites, blacks, Hispanics, Asians, Native Americans, people with disabilities, LGBTQ, and older adults.

The implications of work-force diversity for supervisors are widespread. They must be flexible enough in their practices to be accepting of others who are unlike them regarding what is wanted and needed from work. Employees don't set aside their cultural values and lifestyle preferences when they come to work. So supervisors must remake organizations to accommodate these different lifestyles, family needs, and work styles. Accommodating a more diverse workplace will require a broad range of new policies and practices. A supervisor's challenge is to accept diverse groups of people by addressing different lifestyles, family needs, and work styles.

Examples of flexibility for a supervisor would include work schedules that need to be more flexible to accommodate working parents and couples maintaining commuter relationships. Provide childcare and elder care so employees will be able to give full attention to their work. Benefit programs will need to be redesigned and individualized to reflect more varied needs, etc.

36. Explain why actions related to downsizing do not achieve the stated goals in all cases.

Answer: Downsizing efforts sometimes take their toll on workers and the potential financial gains they were supposed to achieve. Several studies have indicated that more than two-thirds of all companies that downsized had problems with employee morale, and those remaining in the organization mistrusted management. Moreover, companies that downsized experienced a higher incident rating of employees filing disability claims.

43. Explain the impact and implications on supervisors of continuous-improvement and process engineering.

Answer: Although downsizing, contingent workforces, continuous-improvement programs, and process engineering are activities frequently initiated at the top management levels of an organization, they do affect supervisors. Supervisors are often heavily involved in implementing the changes. They must be prepared to deal with the organizational issues these changes bring about. Supervisors must define what quality means to the jobs in their unit. The meaning of quality should be communicated to every staff member. Each must then exert the needed effort to move toward perfection. Supervisors and their employees must recognize that failing to do so could lead to unsatisfied customers taking their purchasing power to competitors; should that happen, jobs in the unit might be in jeopardy. Continuous improvement can eliminate many of the bottlenecks that have hampered work efforts in the past. Continuous-improvement programs can help create more satisfying jobs—for both supervisors and their employees. Process engineering may leave some supervisors and employees confused and angry. When processes are restructured, some longtime work relationships are severed.

Work process engineering can generate some benefits for supervisors. It may mean that they have an opportunity to learn new skills. They may now work with the latest technology, supervise work teams, or have more decision-making authority. These same skills may keep them marketable and help them move to another organization, should that time ever come. Finally, as these changes sweep across corporate America, supervisors may see changes in pay structures. Under a process-engineered work arrangement, supervisors and their employees may be in a better position to be compensated for the work they do and receive bonuses and incentives when they excel.

46. One of the key components in handling a disaster is to have a plan in place. Briefly describe some of the most important elements of a disaster recovery plan.

Answer: Having disaster recovery plans often include duplicate and backup systems, emergency work sites, and telecommuting options. Although these are important, one aspect appears to have the consensus of the experts in this arena—supervisory support for employees and their families. Good communications during disasters become paramount to help employees understand what is happening. Supervisors must be able to let employees talk about their feelings and allow them to grieve if needed. Supervisors must also recognize that stress may be rampant for some employees, and some may become depressed and need additional assistance. In such situations there are no manuals to rely on; rather, such times require supervisors to be kind, sensitive, and empathetic. And they must do this at a time when they, too, may be experiencing the same emotional “crises” as their employees!

53. Explain why the role a supervisor plays in establishing ethical behavior in a department is critical.

Answer: Supervisors play a critical role in establishing ethical conduct not only within their department but often across an organization as well. If the behavior of a supervisor is ethical, there is a stronger likelihood that employees will follow suit. Ethics commonly refers to the rules or principles that define right and wrong conduct. Supervisors face ethical dilemmas. There are situations where supervisors are required to define right and wrong conduct. By their comments and behavior, supervisors are a primary source for conveying an organization's ethical climate. For most employees, their supervisor is the only contact they have with management. Management's ethical standards are interpreted by employees through the actions of supervisors. If supervisors take company supplies home, cheat on their expense accounts, or engage in similar practices, they set a tone in their work group that is likely to undermine all the efforts by top management to create a corporate climate of high ethical standards.
