1) Why is culture often taken for granted and considered as being "natural" for members of the society in which it is practiced?

Answer: Culture is the lens through which we perceive and evaluate what is going on around us. Although there is nothing "natural" about culture, it is assumed to be so because the material and nonmaterial aspects of a respective culture are all that we have usually experienced since birth. As Linton said, "The last thing a fish would ever notice would be the water." We have a tendency to use our own standards and ways of doing things as the yardstick by which all other aspects of society are judged.

- 2) What is ethnocentrism? Discuss how ethnocentrism can have both positive and negative consequences for group life. Provide examples to illustrate your discussion of the positive and negative consequences of ethnocentrism.

Answer: Ethnocentrism is the tendency to use our own group's ways of doing things as the yardstick for judging others. Positive effects include the tendency to build group loyalty, social solidarity, and patriotism, and to deal with threatening situations effectively. Negative consequences are based primarily on the tendency to allow ethnocentrism to overshadow our relationships with others who are different, creating prejudice and discrimination. A positive impact of ethnocentrism was America's ability to improve in math and science during the Cold War. A negative example would be the mass murder of Muslims by the Serbs in Bosnia.

- 3) What is cultural relativism? Why do some people find it difficult to practice cultural relativism?

Answer: Cultural relativism is the attempt to understand an unfamiliar culture on its own terms. Cultural relativism is difficult to practice because one's own culture appears to be both natural and right, since it was acquired as a child and practiced throughout life. When one encounters a new and different culture, the practices, tools, values, and behavior may be radically different, resulting in confusion and disorientation. This further adds to the inability to accept or objectively evaluate a different culture.

- 4) Why did Robert Edgerton advance the notion that cultures should be evaluated on their "quality of life" and not their own merit? How does this reject the concept of cultural relativism?

Answer: In cultural relativism, all cultures are evaluated based on their own cultural beliefs and not the standards of the respective evaluator. Edgerton points out that some cultural practices are harmful, violate human rights, and are contrary to any form of logic or rational explanation. Examples would be the practice of female mutilation in some African tribes, sacrificing virgins by cults, and unsanitary practices such as urinating in the street.

- 5) Are gestures universal? Defend your answer.

Answer: Sociologists and anthropologists tend to agree that many gestures are subject to interpretation based on the cultural setting in which they are used. Some argue there are no universal gestures at all. Others point to expressions of anger, pouting, fear, and sadness as being built into the biological makeup of all human beings, which could therefore be considered universal.

- 6) Identify and define the seven basic elements of nonmaterial culture.

Answer: The seven basic elements of nonmaterial culture are gestures, language, values, norms, sanctions, folkways, and mores.

(1) Gestures are the ways that people use their bodies to communicate with one another.

(2) Language is a system of symbols that can be strung together in an infinite number of ways to represent objects and abstract thoughts.

(3) Values are the standards by which people define what is good or bad, desirable or undesirable, beautiful or ugly.

(4) Norms are the expectations or rules of behavior that reflect and enforce values.

(5) Sanctions are expressions of approval or disapproval given to people for upholding or violating norms.

(6) Folkways are informal norms that are not strictly enforced.

(7) Mores are serious norms that are strictly enforced because they are thought to be essential to the values or well being of a group.

- 7) What is the Sapir-Whorf hypothesis? Provide at least two examples of how the Sapir-Whorf hypothesis impacts our perceptions of the world.

Answer: The Sapir-Whorf hypothesis states that language creates ways of thinking and perceiving our social world. It indicates that rather than objects and events forcing themselves onto our consciousness, it is language that determines our consciousness. For example, some cultures have no word for being "early" or "late," so no one is ever early or late, they just arrive when it was intended. Similarly, other cultures have no word for "violence" and as a result they are a much more peaceful and docile society.

- 8) Folkways, mores, and taboos are types of norms. Describe the differences between them and give an example of each.

Answer: Folkways are norms that are shared and encouraged, but not strictly enforced. Mores are norms that are taken seriously because they are seen as essential to our core values, so we insist that people conform to them. Taboos are norms that are so strongly ingrained that even the thought of not conforming produces a negative emotional reaction, and infractions can lead to serious sanction, imprisonment, or death.

- 9) Monique, Alice, and Rebecca are high-priced call girls who work large conventions and have exclusive client lists. They are meticulous in the clients they choose to service and only work for exclusive, high-paying patrons. Are Monique, Alice, and Rebecca members of a subculture or a counterculture? Explain the reasons for your answer.

Answer: Monique, Alice, and Rebecca are members of a counterculture. Although they have an exclusive clientele and are selective in the patrons they choose, their method of earning a living violates the Judeo-Christian concept of monogamy and it threatens society's dominant values of family and marriage.

- 10) Explain how value contradiction can be a major force for social change. Provide an example of how a value contradiction resulted in social change.

Answer: As societies change, some values become challenged and are subject to modifications. These changes might be gradual or they might occur very rapidly. In any case, as the contradiction between values becomes evident, either one or both sets of values need to be adjusted to reconcile the contradiction. For example, the contradiction between the value of equality and the value of group superiority eventually led to the civil rights movement and federal legislation to reverse Jim Crow laws. The value contradiction that gays and lesbians are pointing out regarding the definition of marriage is causing legislatures across the United States and around the world to reconsider what constitutes a "marriage" as well as a "family."

- 11) What is a culture war? Are culture wars beneficial to society?

Answer: A culture war is a situation in which two groups in the same society have very different views on interpreting the world based on their beliefs, values, and mores. The views are so radically different that they may result in violence, even homicide. The difference between cultural conflict and a culture war is the degree of resistance. Examples of culture wars include the pro-choice/pro-life debate, the traditional man-woman/same-sex marriage debate, and the multiple wife/monogamy standards of Mormons and Christians in the early 19th century. Although the violence and damage created by culture wars are detrimental to society, they also provide a vehicle for social change.

- 12) Edward Wilson believes that sociobiology explains human behavior more accurately than sociology does. Wilson claims that human behavior is the result of natural selection. However, most sociologists disagree with his ideas. Discuss the reasons why sociologists disagree.

Answer: Although sociologists do not deny that biology influences human behavior, they feel that humans, unlike animals, possess a self and have abstract thought. Humans discuss the reasons or principles that underlie their behaviors. They use rational thought, not instincts, to guide their actions and develop purposes and goals. They consider options, reflect on alternatives, and make choices, all of which take place beyond genetic influences and human instinct.

- 13) Define the concepts "culture lag," and "new technology." Provide an example to illustrate how the introduction of a new technology in society produced a condition of culture lag.

Answer: Cultural lag occurs when the nonmaterial elements of culture (the norms, values, beliefs and attitudes) do not change at the same time that new technologies are introduced into the society. For example, the U.S. school year was originally designed to match the technology of an agrarian society when farming was labor intensive and children were needed at home during planting and harvesting seasons. Although the U.S. is no longer an agricultural society, the school calendar has not changed.

- 14) Why is it most common for the nonmaterial culture to lag behind material culture?

Answer: The invention, discovery, or adoption of a new material culture is often the work of one person or a small group. It requires persuasion and time for the new tool and its technology to develop a following. Although it may be an asset to society, people often reject adoption of something new because it is novel, non-traditional, or counter to what was previously believed to be true. It may also require the learning of new skills that are viewed as being difficult, expensive, and time consuming. Examples include the reluctance of many people to receive the polio vaccine, the refusal of many individuals to learn computer skills, and the reliance on the traditional "home telephone" rather than a cell phone.

- 15) Describe the process of cultural diffusion and explain how it contributes to cultural leveling. Give an example.

Answer: Cultural diffusion refers to the process in which a social group adopts some part of another group's culture when they come into contact. This includes material culture such as tools, food, and clothing, as well as nonmaterial culture such as values and beliefs. The group that adopts the material or nonmaterial culture will often change it in some way so the new tool or practice fits the needs of the people using it. For example, when the Japanese adopted baseball, they modified the rules slightly and made some changes to the game. When Americans eat Chinese food, they often use a fork rather than chopsticks.

2.5 Open Book Questions

- 1) Without sanctions, how would material and nonmaterial culture be affected?

Answer: Sanctions preserve norms, and without norms, there would be no structure to daily interaction. We would live in a "fly by the seat of your pants" culture and a "dog eat dog" society. There would be no safeguards against illegal and dangerous products being produced and sold (poisons, explosives, weapons). Behavior would have no set standard. It would be impossible to determine value. The result would be a society without norms, values, or laws.

- 2) Define and describe what is meant by values in a culture. Develop a list of values that you hold for yourself and a list of values that you feel are most agreed upon by other members of your class. How are your two lists similar and different?

Answer: Values are the ideas that people have about what is desirable in life. They are the standards people in a society use to define what is good or bad, desired or rejected, beautiful or ugly. Values define our preferences, guide our choices, and indicate what we consider worthwhile in life. The two lists of values developed will probably be similar with minor variations, but students may find a few interesting distinctions between the lists.

- 3) After reading the text box "Culture Shock: The Arrival of the Hmong" would American students and professors find it more difficult or less difficult to adjust to the Hmong's world if they spent an extended length of time in the mountains of Laos where the Hmong live? Defend your answer.

Answer: Based on the examples used in the textbox, an educated American student or professor would probably have an easier time adjusting to the Hmong culture than the Hmong had in understanding the American culture. It is difficult to know how well "educated" the Hmong were regarding America or how quickly they learned social cues and customs. But, based on the examples, the educated American would be aware of cultural differences and would be able to recognize which Hmong customs he or she could accept and which he or she should find some way to avoid. For example, Americans could urinate along a trail or behind a tree, using some discretion. They could discretely use a handkerchief to blow their nose. Due to their sociological understanding and social skills training, they would be at a distinct advantage over the Hmong when attempting to "blend in." Although Americans would still stand out, they could cope with the cultural differences better due to their awareness of how and why these differences exist.

- 4) Anthropologist Robert Edgerton argues that cultures should be evaluated on the basis of the "quality of life" they provide their citizens. Is it possible to use this standard to avoid both cultural relativism and ethnocentrism in examining cultures different from our own?

Answer: On the surface, the term "quality of life" would appear to be universally acceptable. But then one must ask, "Whose quality are we talking about?" Edgerton's suggestion may seem to avoid both cultural relativism and ethnocentrism, but it may not avoid either. The term "quality of life" has different meanings in different cultures, so imposing our definition of the term would constitute ethnocentrism. Accepting the definition within a culture without criticism would constitute cultural relativism.

- 5) Discuss the importance of gestures for communicating with others. What are some of the popular gestures used by college students and what do they mean? Include gestures that convey both positive and negative meanings.

Answer: Gestures are important because words cannot always be used, or are not always adequate, to convey communication. Gestures act as a form of communication that transcends the use of words. The lists of gestures used by college students will vary. Some examples may include raising eyebrows to convey dissatisfaction, shaking the head for yes or no, raising the hand in greeting or departing, shrugging in to show a sense of confusion, whacking the forehead to show surprise, etc.

- 6) After reading the textbox "Miami – Continuing Controversy over Language," develop a case for immigrants (not only Hispanics) to be able to read and write English at a basic proficiency level within two years of entering the United States. Also develop reasons against such a policy.

Answer: Reasons why there should be such a policy:

(1) Although the United States does not have an "official" language, English has been used since its inception, and all official forms of communication are in English (although some instructions are now also in Spanish).

(2) It seems illogical and totally impractical for all Americans to be required to learn Spanish to accommodate Hispanic immigrants.

(3) Hispanics (and other immigrants who cannot speak English) are at risk when they cannot speak the language. They also create a risk factor for others.

(4) Learning English facilitates and encourages greater social solidarity. Reasons against such a policy:

(1) Enforcement of such a policy would need to include sanctions for those who cannot pass the basic proficiency exam.

(2) Some Americans who are citizens by birth may not be able to pass a proficiency examination.

(3) Such a policy may increase ethnocentrism and elitism.

What other groups in society that have been oppressed and discriminated against have included in their struggle for equal treatment a conflict over their group name?

Answer: People with severe hearing problems were traditionally called "deaf" but are now called "hearing impaired." People with homosexual preferences have adopted the terms "gay" and "queer," and the latter term was (and sometimes still is) used as a disparaging form of address. People with mental disabilities were once called "crazy" or "insane," but are now called "mentally ill" or "mentally disabled." European Caucasian immigrants were called various disparaging names when they first arrived in America, and though they have largely disappeared with ethnic mixing, they are still occasionally used in jokes and during periods of ethnic unrest.

- 8) Define the characteristics of a subculture. Choose at least three subcultures present on your college campus and justify why they qualify as subcultures.

Answer: A subculture is a group within the mainstream culture that has its own behaviors, norms, and values that distinguish its members from the larger culture. A subculture is often described as a "world within a world." Examples of groups that qualify as subcultures on campus might include academic groups, sports teams, a black student union, a gay/lesbian student union, Young Democrats or Young Republicans (or members of other political group), ethnic groups such as a Latino Society or Asian Society, and specific religious groups such as a Newman Center for Catholics. Justifying why each of these groups qualifies as a subculture will be dependent upon the group's members, objectives, and characteristics.

- 9) Why are subcultures often confused with countercultures?

Answer: The term "cult" is often used to describe any group or organization that has a distinctive lifestyle and values that differ from the mainstream culture. When using the term, the image of handling snakes, worshipping devils, sacrificing virgins, or other bizarre practices come to mind. In reality, subcultures are simply different from the mainstream culture and are not necessarily threatening to it. But by calling them "cults," they are confused with organizations that do threaten the values of mainstream society.

- 10) According to the Down-to-Earth Sociology box "2-D: A New Subculture and a Different Kind of Love" the 2-D subculture in Japan has developed because romance has become a commodity as the mass media glorify goods looks and money while denying romance to many men. As a result many Japanese men in this subculture have developed feelings for video characters to whom they view as real. What examples in U.S. society reflect similar values and potential effects?

Answer: Potential answers are too varied to give examples here, because they will be based on many different movies. Good answers will include descriptions of the character and how that character demonstrates one or more of the values held by Americans, particularly those mentioned in the textbox or suggested by Robin Williams and the author.
