49) On the basis of their experiences as English colonists, many people objected to the U.S. Constitution because it did not explicitly protect the rights of the people. These former colonists were aware of the ways in which a government can abuse its authority, and they wanted to avoid it in the United States. As a result, the first U.S. Congress proposed and then adopted a set of 12 amendments that defined the powers of the federal government and the rights of the people. By 1791, the states had adopted 10 of these, which became known as the Bill of Rights.

50) The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no state shall "deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process or law; nor deny to any person . . . the equal protection of the laws." Thus, any law that distinguishes between two classes of persons (e.g., men and women, wealthy and poor, minorities and non-minorities) is subject to attack as failing to provide constitutionally mandated equal protection. Today, all laws that make a distinction between persons based on race, ethnicity, gender, religion, sexual orientation, or national origin are subject to constitutional scrutiny, even when they are designed to rectify the discrimination of the past, because of the provisions of the Fourteenth Amendment.

51) In Schenck v. United States (1919), Justice Holmes found the defendant guilty of inciting antiwar sentiments. Given modern redefinitions of the clear and present danger test used to determine if speech falls within constitutional protection, it is unlikely that the conduct and speech in this case would be considered criminal by the Supreme Court today. In 1912, feminist Margaret Sanger was arrested for giving a lecture on birth control. During the 19th and 20th centuries, meetings held by trade unions were banned, and persons violating court orders prohibiting strikes and labor protests were sentenced to prison. During World War I, individuals peacefully protesting American involvement in the war were jailed for expressing their opinion. The display of red or black flags, which are symbols of communism and anarchism, was outlawed in many states in the early 1920s. Author Upton Sinclair was arrested in 1923 for attempting to read the text of the First Amendment at a union rally.

52) They may run afoul of the specific dictates of the First or Second Amendments, the somewhat broader prohibitions of the Eighth Amendment, or the general exercise of liberty mentioned in both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments.

53) In Weems v. United States (1910), Weems, an officer of the Bureau of the Coast Guard and Transportation of the United States Government of the Philippine Islands, was convicted of falsifying a "public and official" document. He was sentenced to 15 years' incarceration with hard labor with chains on his ankles. The Supreme Court judged this punishment to be excessive and thus in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In Robinson v. California (1962), the Court held that a 90-day prison sentence for violation of a California statute making it a crime to be addicted to the use of narcotics was a cruel and unusual punishment.

54) In two cases that did not involve the death penalty, one non-capital (Graham v. Florida) and the other capital (Miller v. Alabama), the Supreme Court found violations of the Eighth Amendment when juveniles were sentenced to life imprisonment without the possibility of parole.
